NTU GenAI Case - Updates to NTU failing to safeguard students

University

I'm the OP from yesterday's post here: https://www.reddit.com/r/SGExams/s/MtHV1glEDG

In yesterday's post, I talked about my experience being falsely accused of AI by my professor, where even though I provided proof of my drafts and writing history, I've been hit with a 0 and academic fraud record. My professor claimed that my usage of a alphabetical sorter for my citations was AI.

Here's the important update: I'm not alone.

The same professor (NTU course code: HA4040 and HA3026) has falsely accused a total of 5 students this semester. 2 of whom are going through the same situation as me (same outcome), and have reached out to me.

Similarly, they were falsely accused for citation typos, or for using citation formatters, which this professor deems as GenAI.

There are no parts where our writing itself was flagged for GenAI, so this is a complete accusation given out based on the professor's biased judgments.

I'm updating things here to ask students to be careful: There are professors out there whose first instinct is to ruin students' degrees and future careers, instead of lending empathy and support in understanding AI frameworks.

Ironically, the same professor currently has a research grant in AI and higher education.

For 2 months, the few of us have been individually reaching out to so many leaders/upper management in NTU, but we were all ghosted.

We are now in contact with ST and Mothership, thanks to the student community here that blew up yesterday's post.

Thank you to everyone here for all the support, I felt really alone in my situation before this, but now I'm determined to fight this case, so that future students don't get hurt by the same process.

sad that you have to go through this route to get something as basic as this through, but hopefully NTU will be pressured into retracting dumb decisions like these

Qzuitvn090 · 1mo ago
It's not "basic". Just a tip for the young people here, every higher up in every company works for the company interest first, NOT you, NOT the customer, NOT basic logic.

Teachers, admin staff, counsellors, board of directors all don't work for students, they work for the school.

ENTJragemode · 1mo ago · Top 1% Commenter imo - ik this is controversial in sg where confucian values are front and centre, but students, especially in tertiary institutions like universities ARE CLIENTS. not that customers are always right, but universities do owe a duty of care to their students.

teachers, etc. work for the university, but the university is supposed to serve the student 128

Qzuitvn090 · 1mo ago
In a perfect world, the universities would serve students to their best. But in reality, students are disadvantaged clients.
60

observer2025 · 1mo ago · Top 1% Commenter
I worked in unis and research institutes in several countries. Tbh, it depends on the social culture on how seriously unis practise stuff like DEI, address ethics and complaints and allow students/staff to speak up against any unfair treatment.

I've seen research depts (not SG ones), where just because profs are fellows and have the autonomy to bring in huge research grants, they can be obnoxious with low EQ or conduct (sexual) harrassment. Students and staffs under them can complain about these guys, but they'll be ignored by dept heads. "Students are disadvantaged clients" only when the ones committing the misdeeds are influential in bringing in expertises and money, where unis can't afford to lose these guys.

In any case when students are on the disadvantage side, regardless of what's the prof social/academic status, they need to speak up and fight HARD for a recourse.

Qzuitvn090 · 1mo ago
Students or in a more general sense "customers" are "disadvantaged". Maybe I shouldn't have used the word disadvantaged but they are not the priority in the eyes of the organisation.

Every organisation serves its own interest, usually for profit, directly or indirectly. Then comes other factors like "students" that may affect their main goal(profit) by having their reputation smeared or glorified.

Trump can do whatever he wants and the best unhappy Americans can do is to protest. South Korea's President Yoon Suk Yeol declared martial law and South Koreans did manage to stop him.

Speaking up in Singapore? I don't think we learn that here with our protest laws.

> Tbh, it depends on the social culture on how seriously unis practise stuff like DEI, address ethics and complaints and allow students/staff to speak up against any unfair treatment

It does depend on social culture. Here are some quotes from https://doi.org/10.1080/10911359.2013.831011

As an illustration, consider an ill person's visit to a doctor who works in a health care clinic. The doctor's interactions with the ill person are framed by and set within multiple contexts— including legal, economic, cultural, and social—that have been years in the making. The ill person views the doctor as a health expert, and the doctor views the ill person as a patient, and those reciprocal framings load their interactions with myriad historically grounded, culturally, and legally negotiated norms and scripts. The agency of each party, doctor and patient (i.e., the actions they take in relation to each other and the patient's illness), are both enabled and constrained by many factors that are beyond either of their individual ability to unilaterally change.

For example, the primary contradiction caused by the dual motive of doctors to earn a living as well as cure patients might be exacerbated in the current health care setting through the imposition of a rule that allows doctors to spend only 15 minutes per patient—to ensure that doctors see the number of patients necessary to pay for the expenses related to running a medical clinic. In this situation, the primary contradiction is translated into a secondary contradiction in which the rule and the treatment dimensions of the object are in opposition to one another. While in this example the source of change that precipitates a secondary contradiction within the activity system is the doctor's income needs/expectations, the trigger for change could also be external to the central activity system (e.g., insurance company reimbursement policies designed to control costs). Regardless of the source, the pressure of this aggravated contradiction might lead these doctors to rethink their practice to alleviate the tension it creates (e.g., by establishing boutique medical practices with fewer patients who pay an annual fee to belong to the practice).

Correct, without students, where is the source of income stream for universities?

It's only right that academic misconduct gets judged in a fair manner and proper feedback channels are available for students. And OP did the right thing in speaking up when things aren't right.

I still don't understand how formatting of citations becomes evidence of cheating. Isn't that just basic sorting? This prof must justify their actions - publicly.

These types of problems will cascade in future years. Are students expected never to look at AI generated solutions? That's not practicable. I think it's reasonable to look at a solution and use it as a basis for your own work. Isn't that how things work in the real world?

Good luck.

I would've taken an additional year to finish my PhD if I wasn't allowed to use Zotero. It's literally a referencing library. It had 0 input to the substance of my work. It's a joke that it's considered AI.

Actually, my current (non-SG) institution had doubts about whether Zotero constituted AI use. Silly, of course, but not entirely impossible for someone to make the claim. But I take your point that we need more information.

NTU uses Turnitin as its AI detection. However, the three of us were not flagged under the AI detection's software, but the professors' own perceived judgment of AI.

Additionally, we corrected our typos (eg mispellings) and provided the actual versions of the citations we intended to use, so this wasn't "fake citations". I doubt AI would make such typos in the first place.

Yes, that's undisputably the point OP is trying to make. That their professor was doing something that is not, and should not be done in terms of judging their submission. Are you actually stupid? How did you get into uni?

Jammy_buttons2 · 1mo ago
What software did you use for your citations

kaleidostar11 · 1mo ago · Uni
In the ST article, they reveal more information, but some of the citations are non-existent. It's definitely suspicious and calls for further investigation. Not saying that it's not typos, but it was not mentioned in the article , this is as good as no proofs were given by the students.

shopchin · 1mo ago
' I think it's reasonable to look at a solution and use it as a basis for your own work'

If this is always the first course of action, I'm not surprised about the further death of creativity and resourcefulness in the Singaporean mindset.

That's right. As a lawyer I don't read any legislation or case law. I don't read what anyone else has ever written - certainly not textbooks. Instead, I prefer the old school Roman approach: get some geese, sacrifice them and read the innards to decide what to do. I'm an original thinker.

I just assumed she had people protecting her lol. If it rlly is the case that higher ups are slow then it would be even better if OP's story got reported to the news

Jjzeng · 1mo ago · NUS Hackerman (Info Security) Graduate Lo
University admins are typically pretty useless, it takes a lot of escalation for things to get done quickly. I beefed with two profs during my time in uni (one for having 3 deadlines during exam week and another for forcing us to buy an outdated textbook version because that version was the only one that had his name on the author credits) and both times i cc-ed the president of NUS lol. He didn't reply, but i got a response pretty quickly and both were resolved to my satisfaction within a week

Might be time to namedrop this prof and see if any other students or alumni have similar bad experiences with this prof, and it might pressure NTU to take action faster

Empathy? Most of these professors are just out to compete with other profs for grants and high IF publications. I've met more profs that are more cut-throat cunning than having empathy for us students. In fact, most of them aren't even interested in teaching students, they're just being made use of by the university to teach. Every student is an extra burden to them if the student doesn't value-add to their impact factor.

Straits Times did an article about it.

NTU said it penalised 3 students for using AI tools in their assignments, which had non-existent references and statistics or broken web links.

The university's response comes after a viral Reddit post by one of the students disputing the findings. https://str.sg/G8gm

As an NTU alumni, I am quite worried about the state of affairs. Maybe you can start a petition for people to sign? Not just a petition for your own case but an overall petition for there to be a proper framework for determining what's acceptable and what's not. I don't think it makes sense for such things to be at the level of "professor's prerogative" as that's too arbitrary, it should be set at a discipline level (History has their own standards, Linguistics has their own standards, Economics has their own standards etc.). I don't think that's too much to ask and it shouldn't add too much administrative burden to the professors grading the students also. It might even make life easier for the professors, just follow a rubric and mark just like MOE teachers.

I can understand OP's experience because I had studied both locally and overseas and I can tell you this distinct difference between our local and the overseas educators.

Here they are really quick to find trouble with students they consider problematic or your fuck face. You will hear course mates share of certain lecturers who like to have his balls carried. You see some course mates get bullied openly and laughed at.. making remakes like he won't make it in this industry with this type of character.. asking stupid questions in uni level. coincidentally they will either have longer hair than others or just look different.

Suddenly lecturers are assessing your character and making judgment who they want to mark up and mark down. Students are just a number.. how many should pass.. how many can I fail. What OP is experiencing is laziness on their part to investigate. Fuck investigation man.. that's admin work. Just fail the kid and kick him out, that's the easiest.

Overseas lecturers are more nurturing.. you can see they want to help the students learn.. if they suspect you of plagiarism.. they don't accuse you straight up without doing some due diligence. my course mate was quite the intellectual so his work was suspect.. guess what.. they called him up and just chatted about his work.. a conversation to see if he really understood his work or if he was copying pasting. They talked about the various journals he cited and all .. if he wasn't convinced then it will move up to the board..

Different levels before passing sentence. Pretty fair huh? Quite a far cry from what OP is experiencing. All the best OP.

Cheating is still cheating. No matter how many similar cases you try to bring up to support your so-called "justice", it is still cheating. If any university don't punish those cheaters heavily, its integrity and long-standing reputation will be compromised. Universities don't anyhow accuse their students of wrongdoing without sufficient strong evidence have been established to warrant disciplinary actions. The same for the teaching professors. Ask ourselves, what do they have to gain by making false accusation against their students.

To the keyboard warriors here, don't keep talking cheap and lending support without knowing the full facts. Who knows, the one who cried foul is the one who had fouled.

To OP, just go and sue the university for wrongdoing if you deemed fit. No point having all the support here which doesn't support your case in the Court in any way if you are really serious in doing so. Don't even think that people here trust your story, they are just waiting to watch your show to entertain them.

Readers here, please don't be so ready to give your sympathy before establishing the facts of the case. Who knows the one who cried foul is the one who had commited the foul.

Thank god my uni teaches us how to use AI for citations (and encourages the use instead of banning them) Feels bad for your case. Wish you ATB and I hope you get an outcome that's favourable!

Yes haha it's blurry on my phone as well. Can you try accessing the document on a laptop? It works there :) I think it'll be more blurry if I send you over reddit haha

Edit: PMed!

If it's citation typos, provide your original source as an amendment, which should be considered as acceptable, but if it's an invalid citation, then too bad for you.

If you cite, there's no reason for having an invalid citation. It's not the number of correct citations that matters. The basic logic of writing is wrong from the start. A Specific Module at NTU teaches you HOW TO CITE CORRECTLY and CITE WITH AI. If I recall correctly, it's HW0288.

Post your error and justify yourself. I doubt u will be penalised just because of a typo in citations.

This is a classic case whereby keyboard warriors are too quick to jump into conclusion by listening to one-sided stories and bash the university for the sake of bashing. I hope they will learn to be smarter the next time and don't show support without knowing the facts of the case.

Hi, I'm a legal practitioner- I would need to remain anonymous because our professional rules prohibit us from touting, and also I do not think the firm I'm at would be able to act for you due to conflicts. But I've sent you a PM on Reddit, not sure if you've seen it.

The fact that multiple students have reported this professor's injustice should tell you that this isn't just one person being salty against their professor.

Also we have submitted all the evidence of our work and our exchanges with the professor to the media. I even recorded my entire hearing with her.

It's quite odd that you'll blame the students in this case, when NTU has again and again, proven their inability to fight for their students' rights.

I'm just here to talk about a personal experience that happened to me and a few people I know, to raise awareness on a very legitimate issue happening in education. You don't have to take my word for it, I'm only here to share my experience. I wouldn't spend so much effort crafting these posts just to defame NTU for no reason.

How about you wait for the news article to be published instead, since you want your proof?
